COMPOSER’S NOTES

The Cave of Wondrous Voice is a milestone for me in that chamber music is its primary focus. My dad was a devotee of the chamber pieces of Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms and Dvořák, in particular, and countless hours of my youth were spent with this idiom as it worked its magic on my ears and brain. I’m very fortunate to have a terrific crew on board for the program.

David Shifrin and Carol Rosenberger — two tall pillars of American music making their first recording together since 1984 (!) — begin with Intuition’s Dance, an energetic piece in which flashes of virtuosity alternate with dreamy ruminations and occasional off-kilter gestures. The work kicks off with a jaunty solo by the clarinet, then pushes forward with the piano through a multifaceted development section that climaxes with a short chromatic run and two snorts from the clarinet signaling “enough of that.”

Intuition has pulled its own plug, and now must rethink and regroup. A variety of alternatives are suggested and tested the rest of the way. Time and again, the piano points in promising directions, but none of them entirely restores the clarinet protagonist’s early swagger. In the end, the duo settles for a gentle resolve rather than a grandiose gesture and, with three swift octave flourishes, the piano declares “the dance is over.”

Next is the album’s sole vocal work and my fifth collaboration with the great, envelope-pushing soprano Hila Plitmann. Four Poems of Marina Tsvetaeva is of modest length and intended mainly as an introduction to the vast output of this towering and tragic Russian literary icon (1892-1941).

This is the first setting of Tsvetaeva’s poetry in English translation. I know of only two other cycles by well-known classical composers, both in Russian and rarely heard — Dmitri Shostakovich’s Six Poems of Marina Tsvetaeva (1973) and Sofia Gubaidulina’s Hommage a Marina Tsvetaeva (1984). Some eyebrows may raise at the notion that I’ve placed myself “in competition” with these two giants, but I don’t see it that way. In recent decades, Tsvetaeva has gradually been recognized in the West as a seminal figure — but almost entirely by academics and individual poetry lovers, not the public at large. She needs and deserves further advocacy, and I consider my cycle a uniquely American response to her work.

A key factor in Tsvetaeva’s lingering obscurity is the difficulty of translating her verses, which are filled with multiple meanings and linguistic devices that can be interpreted only by a skilled analyst fluent in Russian. I was extremely lucky to encounter one of America’s leading Tsvetaeva scholars, Alyssa Dinega Gillespie, chairman of the Russian Department at Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine, who not only kindly allowed me to use four of her translations but arranged for the cycle’s premiere at Bowdoin on March 29, 2020.

I leave it to the reader to absorb the power, beauty and pathos of Tsvetaeva’s poems, and to investigate her dramatic and harrowing life story. Those involved in the recording — Plitmann, Rosenberger, English hornist Sarah Beck and myself — were deeply moved by the experience of transmuting her words from the last century into a musical form for the present one.

The Elastic Hours shifts us again to instrumental music. The titles of the work and its two movements are admittedly programmatic but (as with the Clarinet Trio) added after the fact of composition. Some time passed before I realized that both movements follow a near-seismographic path that strongly suggests the subconscious mind’s journey through the course of a day. Thoughts and intentions arise and are explored until being discarded and the world made anew several times between sleep cycles.

Friday, a work day, begins with shape and apparent purpose before external distraction and flights of fantasy intrude. The intermingling eventually ends in exhaustion. Saturday, on the other hand, is jolted awake by a nightmare that must be calmed by a soothing and mildly ambiguous figure from the piano. The “off day,” however, turns into a tumultuous and relentless one that necessitates a re-statement of the placid piano motif in the closing bars.

A composer couldn’t ask for more hard-working and enthusiastic collaborators than the ones who brought The Elastic Hours to life. The fine German violinist Sabrina-Vivian Höpcker and up-and-coming American pianist Dominic Cheli not only grasped the thrust of the piece and executed it beautifully, but added colorful dimensions and dynamics I didn’t realize were there. To expropriate an awards category from the venerable jazz magazine DownBeat, Sabrina and Dominic are most definitely “Talent Deserving Wider Recognition.”

In keeping with chamber tradition, the Clarinet Trio is “absolute” music; its individual movement titles emerged spontaneously some months after the work’s completion in 2017. Knowing Brahms’ wonderful Op. 114 trio since childhood was not an intimidating factor for me, but rather a cheerful reminder that this is a nearly unbeatable combination of instruments not exploited by composers nearly as often as one might expect. Having my piece recorded by Shifrin, Rosenberger and Fred Sherry — a third tall pillar — is something I’m very grateful for.

“The Unfolding” is a process, at times eschewing forward motion and wandering into thickets of musing – as if the three players represent different aspects of personality losing the thread of what holds them together. Each time, someone (with a touch of annoyance on occasion) shows the way back. Unity is eventually established nearly eight minutes in – and later even breaks into a confident strut. But the last measures’ slowed-down ostinatos signal that introversion will get the final word.

“Taking Flight” is characterized by kinetic energy and warm lyricism. A half-minute episode midway through hearkens back to the angst of “The Unfolding,” but it’s soon swept aside by an uptempo minor-key section that gives way to a lengthy construct built on two series of rapid piano arpeggios. The music then snaps back into the pulsing motif that opened the movement.

The finale, “In Good Time,” opens starkly with clarinet and cello alone. The piano's entry sets in motion a transition leading into an elegy first intoned by the cello and soon joined by the clarinet. The music gradually moves into sunnier climes, as if a funeral orator was reminiscing about the deceased’s gentle side until, finally, there’s nothing left to say. The clarinet breaks the mood and pushes us back into life’s multihued fray. And so it goes until a peaceful coda brings the movement to a tender close.

My heartfelt thanks to David Shifrin for presenting the Trio’s premiere at Chamber Music Northwest in Portland, Oregon, on July 6, 2018.

The Sybil (1922)

The Sibyl is a powerful and unusual poem depicting the ancient oracles, which some mythologies contend were decayed trees into which God breathed a temporary life and human form — only to disappear into an astral whirlwind when their time of service elapsed.

Sibyl: burnt out, sibyl: stump.
All birds perished, but God has come.

Sibyl: drunk up, sibyl: waste.
All veins shriveled: the zealot prays!

Sibyl: has-been, Sybil: gape
Of fate and death — Ancient tree among maids.

Sovereign tree in the naked wood –
At first, fire rustled as foliage should.

Then under closed eyelids – rushed and stunned,
Through dried-up channels God spewed in.

And, swiftly despairing of outside help:
With heart and voice fallen: into myself!

Sibyl: all-seeing! Sibyl: vast!
Annunciation was done in that

Immortal hour, when grass turned gray,
And fleeting maidenhood became a cave

Of wondrous voice...

A whoosh of stars —
Sibyl: as she quits this earth.

Two trees desire to come together (1919)

Two trees desire to come together.
Two trees. Just opposite my window.
The trees are old. My house is also.
But I am young, or else, quite likely,
I would not pity strange trees’ sorrows.

The smaller one, its arms outreaching,
Just like a woman, overreaches
Its furthest sinews — cruel to watch it,
Still reaching – toward that one, the other:
The older, more unbending being –
And yet the more forlorn one, maybe.

Two trees: amidst the sunset’s ardor
And in the rain — and when the snow falls —
Forevermore: one toward the other,
Such is the law: one toward the other,
Unchanging law: one toward the other.
O sorrow floods my eyes! (1939)
This poem — part of the cycle Stikhi k Chekhii “Verses to the Czech Land” — was written shortly after the Nazi invasion of Czechoslovakia, where Tsvetaeva spent some important and difficult years during her post-World War I exile from the Soviet Union.

O sorrow floods my eyes!
Lament of rage and love!
O Czechia in tears!
Hispania in blood!

O mountain black as night,
That shadows all the earth!
It’s time – it’s time – it’s time,
To abrogate my birth.

I won’t consent — to be.
In this hell of monstrous stares
I won’t consent — to live.
With wolves of public squares

I won’t consent to howl.
With sharks in dim ravines
I won’t consent to swim —
Down streams of human spines.

I don’t need holes for ears
Nor prophet’s eyes to know,
To your demented world
There’s just one answer: no.

God bent under (1916)
God bent under the weight of caring,
Then grew still.
Suddenly he smiled, suddenly
He created

Many holy angels
With radiant bodies.
Some have enormous wings,
And some have no wings at all.

This is why I weep so much.
It’s because I have fallen more in love with those sweet angels
Than with God himself.

“Ravishing, elegant pianism” wrote The New York Times of American pianist Carol Rosenberger, who continues to attract an international audience as she brings her special blend of refined virtuosity and poetically compelling interpretations to both traditional and contemporary repertoire. “Eloquent and sensitive playing” wrote The Times of London, while that city’s Daily Telegraph commented: “Her playing was alive to every fleeting sense impression, yet intellectually commanding. These were ideal performances.”

Since her 1970 debut tour of New York, Boston, London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin and other capitals, Rosenberger’s recital programs and guest appearances with orchestras have carried her to most major European and American cities. Her recordings for Delos have garnered many awards and commen-Rosenberger’s recordings with conductor Gerard Schwarz include concertos of Beethoven, Shostakovich, Hanson, Falla, Strauss and Haydn. With conductors Constantine Orbelian and James DePreist she has recorded works of Bridge, Ravel and Hindemith. She has produced and co-produced many Delos recordings and has guided the Delos Music for Young People Series.

Born in Detroit, Carol studied in the U.S. with Webster Aitken and Katja Andy; in Paris with the legendary Nadia Boulanger; and in Vienna with harpsichordist/Baroque scholar Eta Harich-Schneider. She has been the subject of articles in many leading newspapers and magazines, and in 1976 was chosen to represent America’s women concert artists by the President’s National Commission on the Observance of International Women’s Year. She has been on the faculties of the University of Southern California and California State University, Northridge, and has given performance workshops for young musicians on campuses nationwide.

In 2007, after the deaths of Delos founder Amelia Haygood and chief engineer John Eargle, Carol took over the directorship of Delos. In 2017 she finished writing a book, “To Play Again,” about her remarkable journey back to the concert stage after a crippling attack of polio in 1955, which threatened to end her piano-playing forever.
Released in 2018, the book was awarded a prize in the memoir category by the Independent Publisher Book Awards.

Hamburg-born Sabrina-Vivian Höpcker is one of Germany’s most renowned violinists. Legendary music critic Joachim Kaiser has described her playing as “beguiling” and praised her recordings for their “vitality, intensity and quality.”

Similarly, The Strad, the world’s leading string music magazine, enthused about her “impeccable intonation”, “honeyed tone” and “mercurial dexterity” on her CD Habanera for the True Sounds label, adding: “The gifted young German violinist’s silky virtuosity makes light of the hair-raising difficulties the music presents.”

Ms. Höpcker’s 2018 album on the Delos label features the entire set of Brahms’ 21 Hungarian Dances in the seldom-recorded version by Joseph Joachim. It was chosen “Album of the Week” by KUSC, Southern California’s most important classical radio outlet.

After her Carnegie Hall solo debut in October 2019 with an all-Paganini program, The Hedonist wrote: “The elegant Sabrina-Vivian Höpcker made a statement with her regal presence and a cavalcade of tonal elegance, admirable technique and passionate interpretation.” Maestro Marcello Abbado, former chairman of the jury of the Michelangelo Abbado International Violin Competition, said of her playing: “Her musicality is enchanting, her tone superb, her technique incredible, her virtuosity extraordinary. Brava, Super Brava, Bravissima!”
As a soloist Sabrina has performed with such ensembles as the Bavarian State Orchestra and eminent conductors including Andris Nelsons, Yehudi Menuhin and Zubin Mehta, who described her as an “excellent violinist with a huge musicality.”

Ms. Höpcker has won 1st prizes at many national and international violin competitions, most recently at the International Abbado Violin Competition in Milan. She holds the Hofheim am Taunus Bach Award, the Paolo Borciani Prize for chamber music, and the Alois-Kottman-Prize in Gold, in collaboration with the city of Frankfurt am Main.

Sabrina derives particular artistic satisfaction from chamber music (with partners like Fabio Bidini, Wolfgang Emanuel Schmidt, Dominic Cheli and Johannes Moser) and devotes herself to it with a special fervor.

Mr. Cheli gave his Carnegie Hall recital debut in March 2019, and later that year, recorded music of Liszt/Schubert for his second CD on the Naxos label. In July 2017, his first album, featuring the music of Muzio Clementi, was hailed as “definitive performances that match splendid playing with an appreciation of Clementi’s diverse, classically based style.”
A native of St. Louis, Dominic has performed with the Metropolitan Orchestra of St. Louis, as well as the San Diego Symphony, Columbus Symphony, Princeton Symphony, Colburn Orchestra, Virginia Symphony, Nordwestdeutsche Philharmonie (Germany) and more. Mr. Cheli has debuted at several major festivals, including the Ravinia Festival, Aspen Festival, Mostly Mozart Festival and the Virginia Arts Festival. Engagements in 2020/2021 include appearances with the Seattle Symphony, a re-invitation to Ravinia, his debut at Alice Tully Hall, and recitals in Philadelphia, Washington and New York. In 2017, Dominic was named 1st prize winner of the Concert Artists Guild Competition in New York City.

Mr. Cheli has performed as an artist for Project: Music Heals Us, a nonprofit organization that presents interactive classical music performances to diverse audiences in order to provide encouragement, education and healing, with a focus on elderly, disabled, rehabilitating, incarcerated and homeless populations.

Dominic has studied at the Manhattan School of Music, Yale University and the Colburn School. Andre-Michel Schub, Peter Frankl, Fabio Bidini, Zena Ilyashov and Sylvia Rosenberg have been especially influential on his development as an artist.

originally from Ohio, and received her Bachelor of Music Degree, Magna Cum Laude, from the University of Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music. Her teacher there was Sara Lambert Bloom.

Composer Mark Abel has been based in California for the past three decades. A rock musician and producer in New York as a young man, Abel began developing his classical compositional style during a 20+-year career as a newspaper editor in San Francisco. His music began to circulate more widely after he became affiliated in 2012 with the Delos label, which has released five Abel albums, including The Cave of Wondrous Voice.

Abel’s idiom eludes easy pigeon-holing. He primarily writes vocal music, whose contours extend from art song to larger forms with orchestra to a 103-minute chamber opera, Home Is a Harbor. Along with a strong gift for melody, Abel is also a lyricist of considerable emotional power. He has over time developed an unusual, sturdily constructed hybrid of classical, rock and jazz, constantly working toward new and more refined expressions of that synthesis.

Abel has set poetry by Rainer Maria Rilke, Pablo Neruda, Marina Tsvetaeva, and California poets Kate Gale and Joanne Regenhardt. He has recently focused his attention on instrumental chamber music, while continuing to write song cycles and work on larger-scale vocal projects, often for renowned soprano Hila Plitmann and in collaboration with Gale.

Abel’s first recordings for Delos were Terrain of the Heart, a collection of three song cycles, and The Dream Gallery, a seven-movement cycle for soloists and chamber orchestra depicting the lives of archetypal Californians from all walks of life. Terrain was praised as “art song at a high-water mark of invention” and Gallery attracted notices such as “profound and compelling.”

Gramophone’s Donald Rosenberg, reviewing Home Is a Harbor, which pairs the opera with the song cycle The Palm Trees Are Restless, lauded Abel for “employing a colorful blend of styles that serve the emotional nature of each work to bracing and poignant effect.” He added that Harbor’s
“lucid narrative and vibrant vocal lines ... make (the opera) an affecting experience.”

Fanfare’s Huntley Dent wrote of Time and Distance: “(Few) current songwriters rival Abel’s intriguing texts and their reach into so many psychological and cultural issues. Meaning and melody go hand in hand in a very contemporary way.” The same album prompted The Journal of Singing’s Gregory Berg to call Abel “a composer with bold and ambitious ideas ..., (with) an impressive body of work that grows by the day.” The European magazine Pizzicato labeled him “one of the most interesting figures in American contemporary music.”
